

Self-Propelled Mine

Place of Origin - Giadian Empire

Manufacturer – Legion

Weight - ~0.077 tonnes

Propulsion Systems - Bipedal Walker System

Crew – Unmanned

Main Armament - Antipersonnel High-Performance Warhead

High-Performance Forged Fragment
Warhead

Plastic Aluminum Disposition Smokescreen

The Self-Propelled Mine is a disposable Antipersonnel Type Legion that is used as a suicide-bomb unit. A weapon radically different from all other types of legion, the Self-Propelled Mine is usually mistaken for an injured soldier and will attempt to cling onto humans and Feldreß alike then self destruct. The Warhead located in their abdominal cavity is capable of completely vaporizing a human or taking down a Feldreß along with it's processor. The Self-Propelled Mine is the only Legion capable of producing audible human sounds crying "Save me" and "Mommy" to attract enemy soldiers. A child model produced in greater numbers early in the war was used to devastating effect as civilians still occupied the battlefield claiming the lives of many soldiers. After the events of the Charité Operation, Self-Propelled Mines are capable of greater strategic thought. In one case ignoring Spearhead Squadron to cause a collapse of the facility they were in. A later model encountered in the Raid on Dragon Fang Mountain is seen to be able to deploy a chaff smokescreen disrupting optical sensors and radar.